

The Hidden Places

A robin makes her nest in the wreath on our front door.

The mailman discovers the speckled eggs, bending his bad back sideways to peer at them.

Tender in a way I hadn't expected.

Two weeks later the babies appear overnight nut-brown and sticky and wailing still shaking off pieces of shell and stars.

I lie on the other side of the door,

my ear pressed to the cool wood listening to the thump and murmur of new life.

In the morning,

I walk to the edge of the pond.

I slip off my socks, and my white winter toes blink in the light.

The littlest fish with gaping yellow mouths

are glad to see me—

my pinky toe is a wonder of the world!

I am the spectacle of the sandy bottom!

Out of the corner of my eye

under the branches that cluster by the shore

I see the sleek stony back of something slide under the surface and sink sighing into the dark.

Into water too deep

for me to follow.

One night,

I hear the singing

friendly and low

of the owl that lives in the trees nearby.

I imagine he is warm

and full of meat.

I imagine he hums to himself and bats his enormous eyes.

Abruptly, the fur on my dog's haunches swells.

Hissing rises from the yard below—

a meeting of creatures, who knows what,

swathed in dark.

The owl is quiet now,

so the dog and I wait in the silence

for his swinging song to begin again.

On the back patio,

my cat shakes a mouse between her jaws and snaps his front leg between her teeth.

She bats him into the air four sharp, humiliating times

then leaves him

to drag himself away

through a crack in our fence—

to find a warm and private place,

under some rock,

where he will curl inwards
and let his small body stiffen and cool.

There will always be a warm and private place,
water too deep,
silence,
a door.

This is all that we do not see—all that we cannot see
to preserve what is tender
and what is sacred:

dew settling in the early morning
the wet and panting birth of a deer
the aspens, with their great dark eyes, blinking at one another in the night.
